It wasn't an issue on Windows 7 but it was on Windows 8.1. I tried a few things such as downloading the Open PDF extension and reinstalling Adobe Acrobat Reader. None of it seemed to work. Eventually I installed the Compare Suite Standard Product Key (Which is the same as File Compare Standard) and as soon as I installed it,.PDF files opened in the program and stayed there. That was great! I'm still not sure why.PDF files seem to disappear so often on Windows 7 but don't on Windows 8.1. Perhaps it's a virus? Also, I wasn't really looking for a free alternative (which I guess is the most important question I should have asked). I just used the trial version because I don't want to spend money. But I am very glad I did. A: I think this may be a (common) virus of some sort. From my experience: (1) When using the compare utility on a PC with Windows 7, the file comparison always works. (2) However, on Windows 8.1, the file comparison sometimes doesn't work. It can be a.PDF file, but is not limited to that. (3) I have tried running an anti-virus scan and the comparison worked. Basically I have a main program that asks the user for a file name and then does stuff to the file, but I want to create a subroutine that asks the user for a file name, then runs my code on that file, and then asks the user for a second file name and does stuff to that file, etc. So what I am doing is making the file open in the main

The comparison compares the contents of two or more files, or folders. The comparison is made side by side, character by character or by keywords. The different characters, words or fragments are highlighted for better visibility. Image comparison is made at pixel level. The user can personalise the threshold for color differences and which file types to compare. Some previous versions supported only one type of comparison. Now this functionality can be extended and the choice is made based on the type of files you want to compare, whether it is a text, a binary file or an image. The files to be compared are specified on the main window. As a result, you can compare several files (with only one command) or compare several folders (with one command). You can even compare two folders with files from both folders. The comparison can be made on the text, the binary data or the image data in the files. On the text data of the documents, the comparison is made on the text itself and not on the bytes sequence of the text data. In this way, the binary data of the documents are compared on a byte level. An image comparison uses the pixels of the images as data, so a pixel by pixel comparison is done. A comparison of two or more folders allows you to compare all the files in the folders. Complex and easy to use, Comparison Suite Standard works great and has a powerful feature set. From a single command you can perform numerous comparisons. You can also create reports summarising all the comparisons performed. Key features: 1. Image comparison Image comparison is a pixel level comparison. It compares the color of the image of the files. You can change the threshold for image color differences. If a file has a different color than its sibling, you can specify whether you want to highlight the color difference or not. 2. General purpose comparison General purpose comparison is made on text data, binary data and image data. It includes comparison of the name and size of the files, creation date, last modified date, file attributes and special character properties. The comparison is made side by side. 3. Individual document comparison Different types of comparison are possible, such as the comparison of text data, binary data, image data or regular files. The user can choose the files or folders to be compared and can even choose to compare two folders with files from both folders. 4. Image comparison Image comparison is made side by side. You can compare the image data of the files, such as text, binary or images. A comparison of images is done on a pixel level. 5. Create comparison report You can create a comparison report. It is useful when you have to compare several files, such as binary files, text files or image data, or several folders, such as with comparison of all files within some folder. 6. Create a comparison summary report
