* Note that it's important to work slowly and deliberately, keeping in mind that the ability to see how your changes appear in your finished picture may be hindered if the image is too small. * If you're working with a large number of images, it's best to shoot a few photos of the image as you work. This way, you can remember what you did and come back to make further changes.

Q: Is it possible to write a loop to cycle through all elements in an array? I was working on an experiment for school and I had to cycle through each element in a given array, which required for me to write a loop. I am wondering if there is a method in Ruby that can do this for me automatically. A: There is no looping available for arrays, but there is a bi-directional iteration going on. So you can translate the following: [1,2,3] Into [3,2,1] The you can start over again [3,2,1] Into [1,2,3] And it should continue in a loop forever unless you manually break it or stop it. But the big question is, why do you want to do this? This is a nice build, but I'm not sure how much of a good idea it would be to drop a dual 750 into that. Usually you would want a slightly more robust setup in such a situation, something like a dual 750, or if there is room a 1000 liter pot/double pan. I'd personally add a Mistral Dual 750 as a pot/double pan and build out to a Rigg 20-24" with an Arctic Sun in the main and 100-110 on a Nova, then a dual atom. The main would have no restrictions as the Nova builds out further in an apx 24" slalom boat while sitting in a 18" hull. Other possibilites would be the Ranger 70 or a C7. I run the 1000-1100-1200 watt range all day long and still manage to keep the kw load in the 1-1.5 gals range. The older 400 watt winter lights have always ran like a champ despite the bigger power draw. The wattage doesn't tell you how efficient the bulbs are. The trick is to get lights that are better than the power draw of the lamps. I had a Clark Reactor that was not only the best of the best, but it was also the light I couldn't have topped. No one could outlight it. For just the bare minimum of drift lighting, there's no replacement for the Reactor...even the cheaper ones are better than the first run consumer products that are currently being sold. No one even remembers them now... The main
