According to a new report from a research firm, China is predicted to become the dominant supplier of both fiber optic cable and connectors to North America by 2011. Furthermore, the Asian region is predicted to surpass $300 million by 2011 in revenue for Chinese-made products. Over the last decade, China has increased its share of the global market for optical fiber cable, connectors, and other components by 10%. The report finds that this trend will continue as the Asian market grows and demand in North America increases. The report details that North America will continue to lag behind in the adoption of optical fiber technology. Additionally, it cites the U.S. market for optical fiber cable will decline, but the market for connectors and components will increase. This will make China the dominant supplier of both product types in North America by 2011. The report was released by the Freedonia Group, a research and consulting firm. The Freedonia Group focuses on the optical cable and connector market, noting that the Asia-Pacific region will be the dominant region for optical cable and connectors. The report states that China, Japan, South Korea, Taiwan, Singapore, Hong Kong, and Australia will collectively account for 90% of the global optical cable and connector market by 2011.Conferences are only fun if you have fun people to connect with.
