Reconstitution of the thromboxane receptor mediates the loss of endothelium-mediated relaxations. The thromboxane (TX) receptor, which is a member of the heptahelical family of G protein-coupled receptors, mediates vascular vasoconstrictor actions of TXA₂. This receptor can be expressed in arterial myocytes and may be lost as vessels mature. To determine if this loss was linked to the development of functional vascular smooth muscle, we studied whether the loss of the receptor from cultured rat aortic smooth muscle cells (RASMC) was associated with the loss of vasoconstrictor and relaxant responses to TXA₂. Specific binding of [125I]-9,11-didehydro-6, 9-epoxy PGF₂ alpha-methyl ester ([125I]-PDGE₂) was found in RASMC, which was of high affinity, saturable, and reversible. The pharmacologic profile of binding corresponded to the known TXA₂ receptor in RASMC. The specific binding of [125I]-PDGE₂ to RASMC was lost when these cells were cultured for greater than 5 days in serum-free medium. When cultured cells were labeled with [125I]-PDGE₂ at high density, ED₅₀s and E max for relaxation of prostaglandin-precontracted RASMC were then progressively reduced, with half-maximal loss at 1-3 days in serum-free medium. When these cells were reinfected with [125I]-PDGE₂ in medium containing serum for several days, the specific binding and function of the receptor were completely restored. These data suggest that the loss of the TXA₂ receptor from RASMC is associated with functional responses to this receptor in mature cells. Ask HN: Can we predict stuff, in terms of probabilities? - jonah Finnish linguistics has a theory that language evolution happens in terms of probabilities. I think we all know someone who, they'd go up to someone they don't know and shout "hey" rather than "hi", it's a result of this. Others use words they don't know sometimes. Another example would be that people who wear glasses for whatever reason tend to do so a bit more often than people who don't. I think this idea has been around for a while, but have never read it critically. Can any of us comment on
