Direct visualization of the role of electrostatic interactions in the photoreaction of chitinase with chitosan. Electrostatic interactions are thought to be the major mechanism underlying the interaction between proteins and polysaccharides such as chitin and chitosan. In this study, electrostatic interactions are isolated from the overall process by inducing the specific binding of chitinase to chitosan using the well-established method of the enzyme-linked immuno sorbent assay and the second-derivative ultraviolet spectra.

Spectroscopic data obtained from the chitosan solution and the bound chitosan in the presence or absence of different concentrations of the negatively charged chitinase, ChiA, suggested the binding of ChiA to the chitosan surface by different mechanisms. Specific binding of ChiA was observed in 0.025 wt% chitosan and 5 microg/mL chiA. In the latter concentration, the maximum negative charge density of the polysaccharide surface increased, and thus, the isoelectric point shifted toward the positive direction. Conversely, in the former condition, the binding of ChiA to the surface of chitosan was repulsive, resulting in the formation of an all-out molecular structure that was more compact than chitosan. Furthermore, chiA bound to chitosan not only by electrostatic interactions but also by hydrophobic
