Creative Labs SBS A80 Speaker System. Efficacy and safety of a single dose of naltrexone in the treatment of alcohol withdrawal. Out of a group of patients hospitalized for detoxification from alcohol, one group was administered a single dose of naltrexone upon hospitalization and another a placebo. The latter group served as the control group. The efficacy was judged by the length of time taken to achieve positive urine alcohol testing and the development of symptoms of early relapse, as recorded on videotapes. Blood samples were drawn at the time of hospitalization and on days 3, 8, and 15 to determine alcohol levels. Thirteen out of a total of 15 patients in the naltrexone group were successfully detoxified by the end of the week, whereas only five out of a total of 10 patients in the placebo group had successful detoxification. One patient in the placebo group showed a tendency to relapse during the study period. In the naltrexone-treated group, no tendency to relapse was observed. There was no significant difference in the blood alcohol level between the two groups on the day of hospitalization. There was also no significant difference in the mean number of symptoms recorded in the two groups during the 1st week after detoxification. The data suggest a possible therapeutic role for naltrexone in the treatment of alcoholics in combination with routine medical treatment. 1. Technical Field This invention relates to electrodes, and more particularly to an anode electrode for a fuel cell. 2. Background Information A fuel cell is an electrochemical device that converts chemical energy produced by a reaction directly into electrical energy. Generally, fuel cells convert the chemical energy of a hydrocarbon fuel and an oxidizing agent (e.g., oxygen from the air) directly into electricity at higher efficiencies and with lower emissions than combustion in a conventional internal combustion engine. A common type of fuel cell is known as a proton exchange membrane (PEM) fuel cell, such as those that use H₂ as a fuel and O₂ as an oxidizing agent. The PEM fuel cell includes a membrane-electrode assembly (MEA) comprising a thin PEM disposed between two graphite-doped catalytic layers. The MEA is typically disposed between a pair of electrically conductive plates, which serve as current collectors for the anode and cathode gases, to form a single PEM fuel cell. In a previous configuration, the plates used as current collectors for the fuel and air

My company is soon to start using a technology (AWS LAMP stack) for its website. Some of our client's applications will also use this technology for some aspects of the system. We are going to start using this technology, and we want to move some of our existing PHP session data onto this new technology (or perhaps a different database). Is this possible? Do we need to either do some additional configuration, or some sort of PHP session handler? A: You can run any database on any server (you just need a client). Your PHP session data would then be written to the database. If the previous technology was MySQL, it would basically be a simple UPDATE query. If you had PostgreSQL, it would be a stored procedure call. Having to migrate all your PHP session data to a new environment is a PITA. A way to mitigate this would be to run a cron script every minute that runs a script that would purge your DB of session data. When the script is executed, it would contact the previous site's server to get any new session data, and then use a database-level INSERT to create a new, empty, session row, and use UPDATE to update the old one with the new info. This is just an idea off the top of my head. David M. Barrett David M. Barrett is a theatre director.
