Let's say I have an Android client that talks to a remote server. The server sends data back and forth, but I'm only interested in some of the data sent. However, the server sends back a long string, with an unknown number of data elements inside of it. First thought was, store the string in a "String" object in memory and then when I'm done with it I can simply ask for its length. However, I got an answer in a Google Hangout I participated in recently (it was really interesting :)) and it suggests that one should use an XML parser on the server to parse the string and then build a nice object. So, my questions are: Is storing a long string in memory a bad idea? What's the best way to parse a large piece of XML and obtain the data I'm looking for? Thanks A: With a decent SOAP client you can use client-side caching to avoid holding the long strings in memory. Here's the code snippet from a sample for Google App Engine: protected String doInBackground(String... params) { try { mData = mHttpClient.execute(createSOAPAction()); return mHttpClient.getResponseContent(mData); } catch (ClientProtocolException e) { e.printStackTrace(); } catch (IOException e) { e.printStackTrace();
