Tension-type headache--characteristics of borderline and normal tension headaches. To determine whether differences exist in the clinical picture of episodic tension-type headache in patients with and without borderline personality disorder, 124 consecutive patients (81 women) with tension-type headaches were evaluated using a structured interview and structured clinical interview. Headache duration was significantly longer, and the prevalence of associated nonheadache symptoms was significantly higher, in the borderline group. Headaches were better controlled with pharmacologic therapy and significantly less often accompanied by physical and sexual abuse in the borderline group. Borderline patients reported significantly more anxiety and depressive symptoms, as well as insomnia, than did normal subjects. These data suggest that the "bipolar" and "major depressive" subtypes of tension-type headache may represent expressions of either depression or anxiety. As a group, the borderline patients had a history of more nonheadache symptoms and these may represent precipitants of headaches. Borderline patients are more likely than controls to seek medical care for headache. To establish a safe and effective database of individual images for reconstructive and cosmetic dentistry. Given the speed with which Zika made its way around the globe, it's no surprise the virus is spreading into the United States. Zika is an incredibly difficult disease to catch, and only a fraction of people infected will develop serious symptoms. But those who do contract the virus can face severe problems: the babies born with microcephaly are the most severe of these, and babies born with this problem are usually in a grave state of life-threatening illness. A study released last year showed that up to 2.3 million babies born in Brazil in the year after the virus was first discovered were born with microcephaly. The Zika crisis is so bad that it's even spreading to Australia. The first local case of locally-transmitted Zika was confirmed in Queensland, Australia, on Thursday.
