Fernando Savater. is no pause, all pressure pulses which have still not been admitted into the pressure controllers and have reached the throttling valve with the cams, are pressed into the double-track pipe and conduits, and hence into the liquid stream. It is in this stage that the greatest number of damaged parts occur in all kinds of engines. B. At the end of the long upward stroke of the cam of one cylinder, the opening of the throttling valve is closed and the pressure chamber entirely filled by compressed air. The piston comes down, compressing the liquid which is in the water-containing space within the cylinder. The revolution of the crankshaft, following that of the cam, brings the cylinder and piston to the next bottom dead centre, during which the pressure within the chamber is increased a little by compression of the compressed air, and while the piston is held stationary by the cam, the pressure is again throttled down by the throttle valve. In this manner the pressure is constantly varied.
