Q: What could be the cause of unwanted dots on a laser printer? I have a laser printer that has suddenly started to produce tiny dots near the top and bottom of documents. I have seen the same thing happen a couple of times, but this time around I didn't even know it was printing until I came home from work. The paper that was printed was from one of my work emails. It doesn't seem to happen when I copy and paste a document from another email, so I think it has something to do with the source document, but that's just a guess. I cannot find any documentation on the printer's website, so I'm a little stuck. Edit: The printer prints fine for a while and then all of a sudden start prints these unexpected dots. When the dot pattern repeats, there will be a sudden pattern break. The dots are in the bottom half of a row and the pattern break happens at the next line of dots. I'm guessing that it has something to do with the document, but the logic doesn't make sense. A: So you're printing a document and then you come home from work? It might be an error in the document? If you pull the paper out and you see 4 lines of dots it could be a defect in the paper, but then it would keep happening when you print again. If you pull the paper out and you see only 2 lines of dots, it's probably that your line width has been messed up and you just don't have a lot of points to print. Synthesis of trinitrophenylated polyglycidyl ether of bisphenol A and its direct chemiluminescence detection in aqueous media. In this study, a new trinitrophenylated, water-soluble polyglycidyl ether of bisphenol A was synthesized as an efficient chemiluminescence emitter by selective electrophilic aromatic substitution of the aromatic ether moiety in the side chain. The chemiluminescence from the water-soluble polyglycidyl ether of bisphenol A is exceptionally high; and even a solution of small quantity of the polyglycidyl ether of bisphenol A in water can produce a noticeable light emission.
