I created a base class from NSObject, @interface ECUiBaseObject : NSObject @end Is this class inherit the methods from NSObject? A: Yes, the base class will inherit all the methods from NSObject that are required for the subclass to be considered a subclass of NSObject. If you really want to do this, your class will have to override two methods (I suppose that it's worth telling us why you might do this). The methods required are: +alloc and +init. -init initializes a new object of the class with the class's init method as its designated constructor. Add these to your subclass: + (id) alloc { return [super alloc]; } - (id) init { return [super init]; } Alternatively, if the class isn't going to be a subclass of NSObject, you don't have to do this. In that case it will inherit the +alloc and +init methods. So, subclassing is irrelevant. A: You cannot override init or initWithCoder with respect to the superclass. However, you can inherit from the subclass of NSObject, and override the method, if you want. This is called subclassing, and is implied by subclassing. Typewriter font by Eric Risberg.
