Monday, October 19, 2016 Who said that Scottish people are typically suspicious of outsiders? I think it was Scotland the Brave, the miniseries that usually airs on National Geographic. In that series Nicola Gray plays Jocasta, a Galwegian who disguises herself with a Scottish accent as she travels to Scotland and Wales to meet her forefathers. I just watched this series for the first time, and it's well-made and possesses some intriguing historical insights. There are a number of episodes that are now streaming for free online. So, turns out the Scots are not, on the whole, suspicious of Galwegians, the theory is supported by this brief segment from the first episode, where Jocasta meets a friendly older man in the pub. He seemed strangely positive that he was going to meet her forefathers, claiming he'd gotten her family tree mixed up. Jocasta was not happy to be taunted, but let him go on his way back to his friends. Later, however, the older man dropped by again. He claimed that she was his great-great-great-granddaughter, apparently having had an affair with the first head of the family to have ancestors in their photos. (Nice bit of showmanship, by the way.) Jocasta was now convinced that the old man was deranged and stopped trusting him. She didn

Interaction of sea urchin sperm with testicular egg jelly: I. Adhesion of egg jelly layers. Sea urchin eggs were treated with 100 mg/ml papain, which destroys the surface coat and thus facilitates adhesion of the jelly layers. Esterases and proteases did not affect adhesion. Electron microscopy showed that the surface coat is composed of flattened microvilli. Using the same technique, it was found that the surface coat is identical on the testicular egg, on the sperm aster, and on the "free" sperm head. When egg jelly is equilibrated with egg jelly, the egg jelly layers are not separated. About 50% of the jelly layers adhere to each other, indicating that the sperm aster adheres to the egg jelly. When sperm are treated with the papain treatment, at least a part of them remains attached to the egg after washing. However, the sperm attachment is more extensive when papain is added to the fertilization medium than when treated sperm is incubated with intact eggs, indicating that the surface coat of the eggs influences the sperm-egg interaction./ * This header is generated by class-dump-z 0.2b. * c9d1549cdd

Haemophilus ducreyi, the causative agent of chancroid and related diseases. Haemophilus ducreyi is a Gram-negative, encapsulated, pleomorphic, non-motile bacterium with a guanine-plus-cytosine (G+C) content of 55 to 60

mol%. H. ducreyi has been divided into two biovars according to their pathogenic potential: biovar I and biovar II. The genome of H. ducreyi strain 35000:139 is 2,042,846 bp in size, with a G+C content of 55 mol%. Although recent progress has been made in understanding the genetic basis for virulence, little is known about the details of the mechanism by which the organism causes infection. However, the recent establishment of an animal infection model for chancroid disease (which mimics the clinical course of chancroid in humans) has provided new insights into the pathogenesis of the disease.
