Structure-activity relationships of the anticonvulsant, antidepressant, and anxiolytic actions of the tricyclic antidepressant, desmethyylimipramine (DMI). The anticonvulsant, antidepressant, and anxiolytic activities of desmethyylimipramine (DMI) were compared to those of its major metabolite, 3-hydroxydesmethyylimipramine (HM), using a variety of in vivo tests. DMI produced an anticonvulsant action in the maximal electroshock test (MES) which is the same as that of phenytoin. In contrast, HM produced an anticonvulsant effect in MES similar to that of the imipramine metabolite, desipramine (DSP), but not like that of DMI. Both compounds increased the threshold for clonic convulsions in the subconvulsant diazepam/pentylenetetrazole (diazepam/PTZ) test in a manner similar to their effects on the PTZ test. Both compounds decreased the seizure severity in the PTZ test, but HM was only 50% as potent as DMI. In both the diazepam and PTZ tests, DMI was approximately 200 times more potent than HM. The anticonvulsant action of DMI was no longer observed when it was administered orally. Similarly, DMI was completely ineffective when injected intraperitoneally, indicating that it probably is not absorbed into the body. In contrast, HM injected intraperitoneally produced an anticonvulsant effect similar to that seen with DMI, presumably due to its distribution in brain. Intraperitoneal administration of DMI was less potent than oral administration and was only about 20% as potent as HM. The major metabolic product of DMI, HM, was inactive in both seizure tests; DSP was inactive in the MES test. Since DSP is a potent antidepressant, the inactive metabolite, HM, may play a role in the antidepressant action of DMI. Although DMI was more potent than HM in the aforementioned seizure tests, HM was the more potent compound in producing an antidepressant response in the learned helplessness test. Surprisingly
