Q: Why do aircraft need to be IFR-certified? I always thought that, if you have IFR certification (i.e. a type rating), then you can fly at any time. You only need to buy a IFR-certified pilot's certificate to fly with an IFR transponder. In other words, why do aircraft need to be IFR-certified in the first place? I always thought the only purpose of a IFR-certification is to tell you if you have a type rating. A: Not only does an IFR rating certify that you can fly in IFR conditions, but it also certifies that you've completed the training required to safely operate as a pilot in those conditions. For example, some countries have differing requirements regarding the minimum required flight hours for certain license types - and all IFR-based pilots must have experienced flight in those conditions. A pilot with a multi-engine rating may have much less flight experience than the equivalent fixed-wing rating, and needs less than the equivalent time of fixed-wing flight experience to demonstrate competency. The point is that the same pilot could have a multi-engine rating, and a fixed-wing rating. But because you can't fly without an IFR rating, that means that every pilot has an IFR rating, no matter what type of aircraft they'll be operating. A: Short version: Every pilot has to have an IFR rating, regardless of flight mode. Long version: Aircraft cannot operate in IFR (instrument meteorological conditions) without a type rating. An example for a specific type of rating is a Type-Certified airplane (ICAO type category) that can fly/certify in IFR. You can have more than one type rating (say, an instrument and a multi-engine type rating). These are related to each other, like a multi-engine airplane having both single- and multi-engine type ratings. The multi-engine airplane can do the same as a single-engine airplane with the multi-engine rating, but you would be limited to lower altitudes for that single-engine rating. Strontium 90 leukaemia.
