Updated on 15-Jun-2014 By Natacha M. Sandoval, Contributing Writer Transporting, CNC-ing, and rocket-toting. These are just a few of the things you could be doing with your very own rockets. While creating your very own rockets is an extremely popular hobby, it is also a science in its own right. With this in mind, we are here to provide you with all of the necessary research, information, and insight you need to join the rocket-building community. But before we get into the good stuff, let's start by talking about what you need to make your own rockets.

Imagine the following scenario. You're on a field trip, and you see your friend's favorite professor holding a kind of large, shiny object. Based on the appearance of this, you know your friend has just experienced an amazing new discovery. At the same time, you are asked to help your friend to complete his experiment, and even though you have no idea what is going on, you cannot decline the offer. So, you look at your friend's professor and ask, "What is it?" The professor says, "This is a rocket, and it's made of foil." The next thing you know, you have an incredible idea for a project to work on during the next few months. That project, or hobby

But, Microsoft.There are many common types of physical impairments or disabilities which can affect the user of a prosthetic limb. For example, one common impairments is the loss of a part of the body (e.g., an arm or hand). Another common impairment is the loss of a limb. Other common impairments include the inability to sense or properly interpret muscle movement due to nerves being damaged or cut. The ability to move certain parts of the body can be extremely important for the user of a prosthetic limb. For example, a prosthetic arm may allow a user to hand write, or the ability to control the muscles of the hand or arm can allow a user to hold a beer, cup, or glass. Prosthetic devices are now used to replace or assist with body parts, including limbs. A prosthetic limb may include mechanical components, electronic components and or control components. The components of a prosthetic limb are selected in view of an impairment or disability of a patient. An amputee may receive an implantable prosthetic limb that includes various types of actuators for controlling one or more mechanical components. An implantable prosthetic limb may have a mechanical locking or other security mechanism to prevent theft of the prosthetic limb. Improved physical-impaired or physically-disabled prosthetic devices and associated methods are desired.Field of the Invention The present invention relates to an electrical connector, and particularly to an electrical connector with a shielding member. Description of Related Art An electrical connector usually comprises an insulative housing, a plurality of contacts and a shielding member. The insulative housing comprises a base portion and a tongue portion extending perpendicularly from the base portion and opposite to each other. The base portion is used to mount the electrical connector to a printed circuit board. The tongue portion defines a number of passageways corresponding to the contacts. The contacts correspondingly pass through the passageways, and are assembled to the insulative housing. The shielding member includes a pair of conductive shielding side portions and
