Part III ## PHP and HTML In this part... Phew! With all that Photoshop talk, you might be wondering what this book is actually about. In this part, you find out why you need PHP and how to get it working. You also find out how to work with HTML, and how all that stuff allows you to create the web sites that you want. If you have a basic understanding of HTML, you'll find that working with PHP is a lot easier than working with JavaScript or other languages that require a similar level of understanding. Even if you're an advanced web developer, you'll find that you can accomplish much more with PHP and HTML than you could with HTML alone. Plus, working with PHP gives you more flexibility than working with JavaScript alone because you have access to a large array of functionality in the PHP language. So, is PHP just for web designers? Is it just for web designers who are crazy enough to create and maintain a custom framework of style sheets and scripts? Actually no, because the PHP language is used by web developers all over the world to dynamically produce the data displayed in web pages. If you're going to be creating web sites, the fact that you're working in PHP rather than JavaScript is a win for you and a win for your audience. With JavaScript, a web page can be hard to read and understand because everything that loads happens all at once, and there's no way to stop things from loading until a user has given permission. The users' experience is a lot better with PHP because with JavaScript, every single thing on the page appears at once, and the site doesn't get the information it needs to run until the user takes the time to load

Sen. John Kerry John Forbes KerryThe Memo: Trump's strengths complicate election picture Mark Kelly: Arizona Senate race winner should be sworn in 'promptly' Collins: Subpoenas for Trump's security tapes and documents myopic on investigations MORE (D-Mass.) on Thursday sharply criticized President Trump's national security adviser, Michael Flynn, for recent remarks suggesting that the United States may get away with Russia's interference in the 2016 presidential election. "What is most striking and unfortunate about the Trump administration's reaction to Russia's interference with our election and its sustained campaign to compromise the security of our private sector systems is that it was so transparently cynical and hypocritical," Kerry wrote in an op-ed published in The Huffington Post. The Massachusetts senator said Flynn's statements would only encourage Moscow to go further in its efforts to influence the American political system. ADVERTISEMENT Kerry went on to list several instances in which Trump administration officials and members of his team have offered conflicting explanations for the administration's failure to crack down on Moscow. A report issued by U.S. intelligence agencies last week made a case that Russia interfered in the U.S. elections to boost Trump's chances of winning the election. Trump, White House aides, and lawmakers in both parties have come under intense scrutiny in recent days for contradicting each other on the issue. Democrats have accused the Republican-led Congress of a political cover-up when it comes to Russia's efforts to interfere in the presidential race. "The extent to which the Congress will cover up for and protect the president is apparently unquenchable," Kerry wrote. Kerry said that intelligence and law enforcement officials should be "impartial and independent" when investigating the matter, and that Flynn should be fired if he was involved. He also criticized the administration for not offering public evidence to back up intelligence assessments. "An appropriate reaction would be a measure of bipartisan fury and outrage," Kerry wrote. "The American people and our democratic institutions should not be held hostage, even for a moment, while the administration continues to do what it has not yet done: provide definitive proof of Russian meddling and a fully transparent account of its motivations," he added.Evaluation of the stability of the biological T-activity of human and dog T4

Glycosylation of extracellular domain-derived proteins by recombinant Chinese hamster ovary cells. We have examined the rate and extent of cellular glycosylation of recombinant proteins produced by Chinese hamster ovary (CHO) cells and by a mutant that lacks cell surface alpha-L-fucosyltransferase. The glycosylation of human granulocyte colony stimulating factor (G-CSF) and recombinant human epidermal growth factor (rhEGF) was compared with that of the transfected murine cell line CHO DUKXB11, which expresses high levels of alpha-L-fucosyltransferase. The glycosylation of the recombinant protein derived from the mutant CHOpMZ-E1 was also examined. CHO DUKXB11, CHO pMZ-E1 and parental CHO pMZ cells were transfected with eukaryotic expression vectors and the production of recombinant proteins compared with cells that endogenously express alpha-L-fucosyltransferase. The glycosylation of the recombinant proteins was assessed by mass spectrometry of tryptic peptides derived from the purified proteins. The glycosylation of G-CSF produced by transfected cells was similar to the glycosylation of the protein produced by the parental CHO pMZ cells and by CHO DUKXB11 cells. High mannose glycans comprised 39% of the N-glycans of G-CSF, and the proportion of fucosylated N-glycans and complex biantennary glycans was similar for the three cell lines. Endogenous glycans accounted for 52% of the total N-glycans and the processed core-fucosylated complex biantennary glycans accounted for 20% of the total N-glycans. The glycosylation of recombinant EGF was similar in the three cell lines. Glycans comprised 39% high mannose glycans and 22% fucosylated glycans. The carbohydrate content of EGF produced in transfected cells was similar to the endogenous levels in CHO pMZ cells, but the carbohydrate content of EGF derived from CHO DUKXB11 cells was reduced to 10%, indicating that alpha-L-fucosyltransferase is involved in the glycosylation of EGF in this cell line. The
