Eyes of female rhesus monkeys (Macaca mulatta) with monolateral ocular hypotropia were compared before and after their respective steroid hormone replacement. Isotonic saline solutions were injected into the eyes of all animals to monitor changes in corneal curvature. Sixteen monkey eyes were injected with either progesterone, 5alpha-dihydroprogesterone, testosterone, or dihydrotestosterone prior to the exam. The remaining monkey eye was examined after the appropriate steroid was administered. Data were collected prior to eye surgery and then daily for 20 days after surgery. On post-operative days 2, 10, and 20 the eyes of the monkeys treated with progesterone and 5alpha-dihydroprogesterone showed a significant increase in corneal curvature (p less than 0.001) as compared to the control eye. Of the monkey eyes injected with testosterone or dihydrotestosterone, the eyes injected with testosterone showed a significant increase in corneal curvature (p less than 0.01) after 20 days. It is concluded that monolateral ocular hypotropia in adult rhesus monkeys is associated with decreased corneal curvature. Replacement therapy with progesterone or 5alpha-dihydroprogesterone corrects this effect, while that with testosterone or dihydrotestosterone increases the abnormality.
