Built on Unity3D, Bipolar is not your typical indie game. The art style and the gameplay itself are quite unique. With 50 levels of Bipolar, you will never know what to expect. Each level is its own unique challenge and quite frankly all 50 will keep you in the game for hours. The game features 50 levels, each with several unique challenges. Some levels are based on gravity, others on friction, others on many other concepts, all of which you will have to master to reach the end. How to Play: Bipolar is a game with a simple premise. Learn more about our game here: About: Brain as One (BaO) is a multidisciplinary arts collective based on the Caulfield campus of Monash University in Melbourne, Australia. Our academic interests are in computing, computer games, the arts, sculpture, animation and neurophysiological projects. Brain as One began in 2009 as an arts practice, and has since expanded into game development. The only real requirement to progressing through the game is that your object eventually reaches the end portal. However, the portal may be moved, so it can be tricky to get to. The game has two modes, play and level creation. Play mode simply allows you to play a game of Bipolar. However, creating your own levels gives you complete control over the game. This allows you to create levels which are unique and challenging in and of themselves. Some of the more obvious ones include mine shafts where you must move (and bounce off of) falling blocks of metal and similar hazards; levitating platforms where you must move along the floating surface itself; and space-themed levels where you might be tossed to and fro in outer space. Furthermore, levels can have their own themes. The Interspecies theme for example is based on the conflicts between individuals of various species and the competitions they c9d1549cdd
