What's new in TS Marketplace: B Amp;O Mountain Subdivision Scenario Pack 01:

by William Friedkin (4-CD Box) This four-CD boxed set is the magnificent repackaging of all the music from William Friedkin’s 1970s television show The Kings of Kensington. Those who have already added the box to their collection can, of course, begin here, but for those who have not, I bring you a warning: this box is an act of fandom bordering on obsessive, and will not be for the faint of heart. Indeed, unless you’re a die-hard Friedkin fan, the best way to understand this box is to get over your feelings of wanting to know all the story behind the music and simply explore for yourself. Indeed, I encourage you to write “I’m in.” on the first page of this review. Those who know of William Friedkin’s reputation will note that he directed Sam Peckinpah’s violent western The Wild Bunch, Joseph L. Mankiewicz’s brash British exposé A Place in the Sun and the controversial sci-fi thriller Killer Klowns from Outer Space. His oeuvre also includes the first three films in the Manhunter franchise: a couple of extremely gory stalk-and-slay noirs starring Martin Sheen, and a couple of horrid 1970s monster movies starring Jamie Lee Curtis, Mademoiselle Fatal and perhaps the worst movie villain ever committed to celluloid: Bela Lugosi as The Wicked Witch in 1973’s Wizards. From a film-making standpoint, it’s unknown if William Friedkin would have become a director in the 1980s if it were not for Steven Spielberg’s 1976 blockbuster Jaws, the film that made the 1970s known the world over as an era of giant-sized studio action movies, widescreen heroism and visceral effects. To that end, audiences would also have seen William Friedkin’s 1983 remake of the old Hitchcock thriller Shadow of a Doubt, a more adult version of The Parent Trap starring one Christopher Walken and a kid actor. Steven Spielberg’s 1977 anti-nostalgia flop working title “Robards’ Room” was also based on a true story, which brings us back to the point. The Kings of Kensington, also known as the Robards’ Room series, is a fictional documentary created for Turner’s public-TV channels in 1976, in which four
