I went to a great job interview and have learned a ton about the company as the interview went on. However, my professional resume currently only shows my experience and skills related to that job position. I've noticed the web site has a careers section with information on the business, as well as other job postings. Is it still okay to list my education and the non-job related skills I've acquired on my resume? Here is an example of what my current resume looks like: A: Your resume is supposed to include all the things that make you good for a job, not just the skills you used and the experience you had. Show me the skills on your resume and I can make an accurate assessment of your skills. Show me your education and I can make an accurate assessment of your education. Show me the things you have done or the projects you have completed and I can make an accurate assessment of what you have accomplished. Your resume should be a single document that tells me about you. Anything in there that is not directly related to your job search is not part of your resume and should not be included. A: On a resume, every job before this one should be listed. If you get to job #3, and you're still not worried about that - then you've got big problems. A: In general 6d1f23a050
