I am using windows xpDextranol absorption from the jejunum: role of mucosal perfusion. The absorption of dextrans from the intestinal mucosa was studied in fasted rabbits with one jejunal end ligated and the other end of the jejunum attached to an in vivo perfusion system. During a 6-h perfusion period, dextrans were found to absorb rapidly across the jejunal mucosa. Rate of absorption was constant throughout the experiment, but absorption increased to a maximum rate by the 6th h. Absorption was not altered by prior mucosal application of a 2% toluidine blue preparation, indicating that transport across the mucosa was not being mediated by active transport. In contrast, mucosal addition of bacitracin (100 micrograms/ml) or mucosal trypsinization with T.K. (1 mg/ml) markedly reduced the rate of absorption. This reduction in mucosal permeability after the application of these substances most likely resulted from the action of the trypsin on the enterocyte surface, the loss of the mucous barrier, and a reduction in mucosal blood flow. The implications of the present findings are discussed.
