A: The solutions given below are a combination of articles I found on the web - Don't use adobe's updates as they lead to a cycle where Acrobat updates need to be installed. - Get a 15 day trial of Acrobat Pro X. - After the trial period, the option to update will appear in the 'Update and Preferences' screen. - Select 'Update but do not install.' - It will still run the update. - Close the window and return to the 'Update and Preferences' screen. - Select 'Never check for updates' and check the 'Restrict use of Adobe Updates' box, and center-to-center distance are chosen and the location of the beads is adjusted to achieve the desired spacing. In the case of uneven substrate such as a wafer with different heights or profiles, the height of the bead can be individually adjusted by tilting or adjusting the height of the beading head. The slurry is applied to the substrate with the beads. The slurry can be applied with a dispenser with nozzles of various orifices. The slurry can be applied with wafers transported to the dispenser by a transport mechanism and either tilted to make the slurry fall or moved in the z-direction to contact the surface of the beads. Alternatively, the slurry can be applied by scooping the slurry from a tank or reservoir. As such, the slurry and the beads can be supplied to a reaction chamber by a single method. Preferably, the slurry is applied by dispensing or by simply dipping the substrate into a basin containing the slurry. The slurry is applied over the entire wafer and then the pressure is released. The slurry is maintained at a set pressure by providing a pressure reservoir between the dispensing device and the substrate or through the use of an electrostatic charge. Preferably, a vacuum system is also provided to the substrate to hold the wafer in place and to draw the slurry through the nozzle. The method can be used to deposit a slurry which hardens to form an oxide or oxide in combination with a dopant such as boron or phosphorous. Examples include a slurry having a silica base such as tetraethylorthosilicate (TEOS) and a wetting agent, such as methyltrimethoxysilane (MTMS), at a ratio of between 1:1 and about 10: 6d1f23a050
