to the effects of chronic emotional stress. A wide body of literature links chronic stress to depression and to deficits in cognitive control. Recent research has attempted to measure cognitive control in the face of emotional distraction and to investigate its relationship with symptoms of depression. We compare these approaches in the present paper by (1) summarizing the research on the effect of chronic stress on cognitive control, (2) highlighting the extent to which these two lines of research converged, and (3) discussing methodological limitations that keep them apart. We discuss these in relation to the aim of finding distinct measures of cognitive control that lead to unified theories of cognitive and emotional deficits in depression. Heat shock proteins are a family of molecular chaperones that are induced by many types of cellular stress, such as oxidative stress, hypoxia, or temperature changes. Heat shock proteins are divided into the Hsp70 and Hsp60 families according to their molecular weights c6a93da74d
