YC partner: don't take funding advice from us, from our partners - jorgeortiz85 ===== zasz Funding advice from your own colleagues is generally self-serving, biased, and more than likely incorrect. As a rule of thumb, I don't believe any funding advice I receive from Y Combinator. Even when I do the same. ~~~ yardie There are exceptions, like if the YC partners were already investors in the product. Then they have a clear advantage over the company and they might actually know something the founders don't. And perhaps someone who has already bootstrapped a business is the better bet to learn from. ----- polyfractal So YC currently has eight partners...[1] ...that means they each bring more to the table than just a few shares of money. If they don't want to tell you how to spend your money, they should have told you the same thing before they started accepting money. I don't get the criticism at all, they weren't sitting around telling all the startups how to spend their money. They are simply holding a meeting for a different group of people. [1]: [in](~~~ jorgeortiz85 To be fair, the YC partners aren't the kind of investors who fund startups. They aren't VCs, that's a big distinction. Rather, they are investors who like to give advice to founders. The problem is that (because c6a93da74d
